a patent case. Many people believe that juries tend to rule in favor of the protection of patent rights and that they are inclined to favor small inventors over large corporations. They also believe that juries tend to favor American corporations over foreign corporations. Therefore, plaintiff-patentees commonly want jury trials whereas defendants may not. These assumptions do not hold up in ...

decided by rounding that value to the same number of significant figures as the range is expressed in the claim. It was, however, the construction adopted in this case: 1% is expressed to one significant figure, therefore anything greater than or equal to 0.95% would round to 1% when expressed to one significant figure. This would be the natural approach of the skilled person and there was ...

cases decided before the 1952 Patent Act to argue that §282 codified a pre-1952 practice of permitting laches to be asserted against damages claims. But the most prominent feature of the relevant legal landscape at that time was the well-established rule that laches cannot be invoked to bar a claim for damages incurred within a limitations period specified by Congress. In light of this ...
